Supporting Justice, Behavioral Health, and Housing Collaborations through Federal Funding

OVERVIEW
Across the country, behavioral health, housing, and criminal justice leaders are banding together to address complex public health and safety challenges that no single agency, system, or sector has the resources, ability, or responsibility to solve alone. These cross-system partnerships, including those supported by the Justice and Mental Health Collaboration Program via the U.S. Department of Justice’s Office of Justice Programs’ Bureau of Justice Assistance, seek to improve outcomes for people with behavioral health needs in the criminal justice system and prevent future justice system contact by strengthening systems of community-based care and supports and increasing access to housing. Yet lack of funding is often cited as a barrier to this important work, which may require new investments. These costs may include personnel, equipment, medications, data-sharing systems, and capital expenses such as building or adapting a facility—expenses few communities have incorporated into existing budgets.

Federal funding can be a key source to support the piloting, initial operations, or expansion of interventions that serve people with behavioral health needs in the justice system. Further, federal grants are often paired with training and technical assistance to help communities through the challenges of advancing and sustaining new collaborations. As communities work to establish collaborative responses across the various points of justice system contact, also known as intercepts, they require a broad awareness of available funding that can be leveraged to launch and sustain these initiatives.

BROADENING THE FUNDING SEARCH
Local practitioners often have a narrow window into possible funding sources shaped by where they sit in intersecting systems. This is true at the system level (i.e., behavioral health, criminal justice, housing) and within independent agencies with unique priorities (e.g., law enforcement, jails, public housing authorities). As communities broaden their lenses by working across sectors to address complex problems at the intersection of public health and public safety, they also have a wider range of available federal funding opportunities.

1“Intercepts” refers to points within the criminal justice system at which people with behavioral health needs can be “intercepted” and diverted into treatment and care. These include Intercept 0 interventions, or community-based behavioral health services that prevent justice system contact in the first place, such as community responder models and components of a comprehensive crisis system. Learn more about the Sequential Intercept Model at https://www.samhsa.gov/criminal-juvenile-justice/sim-overview.
Increased awareness of funding options can not only help bridge financial gaps but can also enable or promote new partnerships and advance equity of voice. Some federal programs require or encourage collaboration among partners that have yet to come together or community engagement strategies to advance equity. Bringing in new and relevant perspectives, including those of people with lived experience in these systems, can enhance a program’s design and implementation and set it up for long-term sustainability. The following federal opportunities can be leveraged to launch, sustain, or scale a variety of interventions and initiatives to reduce justice system contact for people with behavioral health needs.

Key Sustainability Tips

- Plan for sustainability from the start.
  Build a sustainability plan into grant applications and initial program design. This may include convening a sustainability committee consisting of stakeholders invested in the long-term financial health of the initiative. The group provides strategic oversight of the initiative budget and drives efforts to secure future funding. Involving impacted populations in initiative planning and sustainability helps ensure that the work is truly addressing community needs.

- Demonstrate impact.
  To obtain additional grant funding and effectively advocate for the use of tax dollars, communities need to be able to demonstrate that the initiative is making a difference. To do this, it is imperative to identify discrete efforts that show the initiative’s effectiveness both quantitatively and qualitatively. Track these key metrics and stories from program inception if possible.

- Partner broadly.
  Partnerships can help leverage additional funding sources to fill gaps and expand an initiative’s impact. Broad partnerships ensure more stakeholders are invested in the program’s success.

  - State partnerships can
    - Prevent duplication of efforts;
    - Help leverage state funding streams to sustain and expand existing justice, behavioral health, and housing collaborations;
    - Raise the visibility of the program and bring what is working to scale at the state level; and
    - Direct formula funding\(^5\) to where it is most needed. Local agencies may partner with state and local administering agencies to apply funding toward justice, behavioral health, and housing partnerships. Below is a list of key formula funding sources:
      - Edward Byrne Memorial Justice Assistance Grant (JAG), BJA
      - Community Mental Health Services Block Grant, SAMHSA
      - Substance Use Prevention and Treatment Block Grant, SAMHSA
      - Residential Substance Abuse Treatment (RSTAT) for State Prisoners, BJA

  - Private partnerships can
    - Seed innovation with initial investments;
    - Provide flexible funding to fill gaps in public streams; and
    - Increase and diversify buy-in to include private partners with a vested interest in the program’s success.

\(^5\) Formula funding sources—also referred to as block grants or pass-through grants—are noncompetitive federal grant dollars mandated by the U.S. Congress. Each state or local jurisdiction receiving formula funding designates an administering agency that submits an annual application to demonstrate statutory and regulatory compliance in order to receive the formula-based funding. Annual applications often require some level of strategic plan or programmatic goal-setting aligned with the funding source’s stated priorities.
